

As a frequent business flyer (>50,000 miles/year), I am living in fear that the FCC will approve use of cell phones on airplanes. All of us flyers would be made victim to offenders sitting near us - - while we are trying to work, while we are trying to relax, while we are trying to sleep. (I'm just envisioning sitting beside the all-night phone call to the boy friend left behind -- no problem with unlimited night and weekend minutes.) As bad as it is to have to listen to rude cell phone users in public places like restaurants, cell phone use on airplanes will be much, much more offensive because of the tightly cramped environment on a commercial airliner. Worried about "road rage" on the nation's highways? "Air rage" will not be far behind if the FCC allows cell phone use on airplanes.
